MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 7, 1878.

The Leopard's Ire.

The last act of the circus had come, and the audience was prepared for the sensation which was to be the climax. The horses and the gymnasts and the clowns had finished, and the wild beasts were to be defied. The circus little wagon that held them was drawn out into the ring, and a woman entered the cage—a slender, lithe, active, spunky woman, with black eyes full of fire and a cruel rawhide whip in her hand. The whip was weighted at the handle and a quick slash would make it a deadly slung-shot, but this the audience did not know.

It was Mme. Rhinehart, and the wild beasts were the lion, lioness and leopard in the Equus-curriculum. It was yesterday, in the afternoon. The woman—cool, careful, quick and keenly watchful as ever—snapped the whip around, and with sharp, angry words of command drove the beasts from corner to corner in the usual style of such performances. It was exciting even to those used to the kind of performance they were witnessing, and to the ladies and children it was thrilling, for the deep, angry roar of the beasts was no mock ragging. They were too sullen to be laughed at.

Suddenly Mme. Rhinehart stepped backward to leave the room for the lion to jump in one of the tricks she had taught him, and she stepped against the leopard. With a snarl that seemed half human in its ferocity the angry beast devoured its prey and raised its paw. The paw turned its moment on the right thigh of the daring woman, and the claws shot straight through the thin garments into the quivering flesh. The jaws now open an instant and then closed on what seemed the woman's body.

Probably not one person in five in the audience realized that what they saw was anything different from the usual performance, for every thing Mme. Rhinehart had done had been done in a flash, and there was no time to realize this before she had mastered the situation. Turning as quickly as the huge leopard had turned she shot her slender white left hand straight from the shoulder to the leopard's throat with a motion as quick as Heenan's and with her right she whirled the whip around and brought the loaded handle down squarely between the two great green eyes that were gleaming hate into her own. Then shifting the whip again so quickly that two saw the motion she raised a sharp quick blow on the forehead of the leopard. There was not time for the shudder the audience began to feel to have passed away before the trick was over, and the leopard had slunk back two steps to the far corner of the little cage, cowed and beaten by a woman he could have rent limb from limb had he known his power.

Only three great drops of blood remained to tell the story of what might have happened, and they did not show on the gaudy dress she wore. The woman's eyes, rigid and stronger than the fashionable corset, had served to protect her from the fangs of the beast, and her arms and legs were only scratched.

At least she called them scratches, when a few moments later she laughingly stretched out a maimed arm and grasped the reporter's hand as firmly as almost to make him wince. She was putting plaster over the scratches, "disinfecting any better treatment. 'I'll heal right up," she said.—N. Y. Herald.
